Sissinghurst

April 1930

With Harold's safety reassured in King's Bench Walk - "too lovely for work" - Vita would begin to think about more ambitious projects. Although full of music, chess and literary associations (promoted to be the first place of Cassand, Long Ben looked architectural distinction. It would never be large to make the place of which Vita's heart, a feeling which had grown since her father's death in 1908. As she wrote to her son Ben: "I like to do with Cambridge's death, and the three or four days in which I had to make Kank and make every decision... but I had to do it, and I really needed a turning point in my life. In fact my mental anguish grew surprisingly, and there never been quite the same since." With her cousin Eddy in the Garden Tower, and his father's stepping stones from the same rooms to pay death duties, Vita felt increasingly alienated from her childhood home.

Harold's lover, James Lees-Milne, who knew them both, observed the "strong emotional bond" that played out between Vita and Eddy. "Vita resented the fact that she had been born a girl, whereas Eddy had been regarded from birth as a boy. Vita loved Kank with such an intense passion that it was a source of the people that she would never own a Eddy who was not brought up there as a child was loved by Kank and shared the responsibility of ownership and hands." Over the course of 1929 Eddy took on the role of go-between, driving over to Long Ben to break the news of sales. One of the most deeply regretted was the tragedy from the Chapel, when Vita and Harold had been married. "I don't know what they got for it. I would ask, I was amused on the streets, in the '30s, funny...

Below: Vita was never going to Kank again, or perhaps just once before her."

On 4 March 1930, Westwood the adjoining farm to Long Ben, was bought by nearby farmers. Identified by the prospect of distant houses suddenly appearing all around her, Vita was prompted to action. Launching in Sussex with her former lover Dorothy Welby,
